Draft of June 6, 1955

"HOW SHOULD THE UNITED STATES ATTEMPT TO ADVANCE THE DEGREE OF UNITY
IN, AND THE EFFECTIVENESS OF, THE MULTILATERAL ORGANIZATION CONCERNED WITH SECURITY TRADE CONTROLS?"

Many difficulties confronting the United States and other countries associated in the CG structure for the past two years would have been avoided had there existed an agreed philosophy or justification for the system of controls against which individual problems could be assessed. The authority of such a "philosophy" would depend on its success in reflecting the essential objectives of trade controls in the light of the military, political, economic, psychological and moral aims of the Free World. In addition, it would help to make it possible for cooperating governments to explain its purposes simply and convincingly to dissident interests within their countries. With such an over-all concept to govern CG operations, its week-to-week problems would largely be technical.

Such a philosophy does not now exist. The governments participating in the CG oppose in varying degrees anything resembling economic warfare. In contrast, the United States tends to favor measures as close as practicable to economic warfare as offering the greatest opportunity to impair the Soviet Bloc's industrial build-up. Certain concepts bridge this gap and are generally acceptable—(1) the Soviet Union is a potential aggressor; (2) it is in the common interest of the West to hamper the war making potential of the Soviet Union; (3)

Union; (3) any efforts to do so can only be effective to the extent that they are uniform among as many important industrial and trading countries as possible. We have built our trade control program on the basis of such generalities, but even these have never been precisely defined.

Notwithstanding lack of an agreed doctrine the United States, in fact, has been able on a pragmatic basis to obtain a reasonably satisfactory degree of control over most of the items it considered particularly important. However, today many items the United States considers strategic are free of controls and certain countries would like to see even a lower level prevail, particularly towards China. The program today is at best static and more probably is moving in the opposite direction from that which we desire. The operations of the group could probably be improved through greater bilateral discussions of the reasons behind our policies--both broad and on specific issues--and the expanded use of the exchange of experts between countries, inter-change of intelligence information, and the use of the CG for discussion of broader economic problems of an East-West nature (e.g., Western coordination before an ECOSOC or ECE meeting). These positive approaches should be kept in mind and used wherever feasible. However, it would seem incumbent upon us to accomplish a more fundamental strengthening if the effective operation we desire is to develop. A basic doctrine which all PCs could accept and which could accommodate the necessary strengthening we believe essential, therefore, remains an essential requirement.

The CG structure has proved its desirability and, now that it is on the "long-haul" basis, need no longer be considered a "temporary, informal committee" as it was during the initial days. Although there may have been no explicit and conscious effort to do so, the change to the "long-haul" concept which the

CG made

CG made last summer may well be construed as harmonizing CG with the long-haul purpose of NATO. Our difficulties in CG could be reduced by recognizing this doctrinairely and institutionally.

On the side of doctrine, it should be established that the complex of factors recognized in NATO as contributing to security, are also directly related to the security objectives of East-West trade controls. NATO has come to recognize that Atlantic Community security is the result, in combination, of:

- (A) Arms build-up;
- (B) Economic growth of the West;
- (C) Increased domestic welfare of the Western populations;
- (D) Acceptance of a common concept of danger;
- (E) Acceptance of the overriding necessity of Western economic and political unity;
- (F) Frank recognition of the mutuality of Atlantic Community interdependence which is expressed in:

- 1. Mutual self-criticism in the NATO Annual Review Committee and elsewhere;
- 2. Sharing of resources, e.g. MDAP;
- 3. Reconciliation of differences by recurring Ministerial Decision.

- (G) Rejection of the "Simple Answer" to the problem, e.g. the Hydrogen bomb, reliance on air power alone, resort to economic warfare, etc.

As to institutional change, the lack of German and Japanese membership in NATO previously has seemed to make impractical any attempt to join the NATO and CG together. However, now that Japan represents the only membership obstacle, the obstacle, the problem is worthy of reassessment (the subject of a separate paper).

There is every reason to believe that at the very worst the United States would at least be as well off in the trade control field as we are today, if CG's aims could be directly associated with NATO's. The system would become more stabilized, have greater dignity and permanence, and be an integral part of the Western defense posture. Whatever control level we might reach in such a stabilization could not be any lower than we would have to agree to multilaterally, regardless, and it is conceivable that under the guiding terms of the NATO alliance, the less easily proved strategic items might be given the benefit of the doubt. The other PCs presumably would also prefer proceeding from broad nationally agreed principles of security to constant bickering—often at very high levels—over what they consider to be relatively minor issues when viewed from the broad perspective. For the short term, no major change would occur by the adoption of a NATO outlook; the constant whittling away at the program could cease and the entire structure would conform—upwards or downwards—with the rest of the defense posture of the Atlantic Community.

*Definitely must

When, and if, CG falls within the NATO concept, we must recognize that, like Defense appropriations (which go up and down in response to changes in some or all of the forementioned factors) East-West trade controls will do likewise. But in so doing, they will be underlining the mutuality of the problems faced by all the PCs. To attempt to keep the controls isolated from changing conditions—either by the United States or other countries for differing reasons—would ultimately destroy the collective nature of the program upon which its effectiveness basically depends.
